

Peace March Viewed

By Harve Meskin

This Saturday, on April 15th, there will be another peace march in New York. Yes, another of the many which are run by the "beatniks and commies" of this country. Such wierdos as Harry Belafonte, Nat Hentoff, Arthur Miller, Tony Randell and scores of other well respected names will sponsor this march. But what is it that they have to say? Are they against the war because they don't like long boat rides, or is it something much more important. Will they be there because they can see too many things wrong at home to correct before we infringe on other's rights? Possibly they feel that they don't want to fight for the rights of others, rights that they themselves cannot enjoy. It is also possible that they can see the fantastic drain the war is causing, - drain on men, moeny and resources. Maybe they can visualize the loss of time in our war on poverty. There will probably be some people in the march that would rather have cancer cured, smog and water pollution done away with, and see everybody get an equal chance at an education and a job, than to have them sit in some God-awful jungle.

I don't know, maybe I'm just fooling myself, but I have always thought it wrong to kill another human being. We have all been taught to believe in and practice brotherhood. But is true brotherhood really achieved in a fox hole? I have some very serious doubts about that, and from the response to the march, I don't think that I'm alone. Ten thousand, thousand marches could occur in the same magnitude of Saturday's, and we would probably still find ourselves in the same hole. Agree or disagree, that is your right, just remember; nothing is completely right or completely wrong.
